

Aristotle's conception of the soul

Aristotle's main work on the soul is De Anima, which we will look at in detail later. Here let us observe the following:

- A says the soul has both rational and non-rational aspects, and takes human motivation to come in three main kinds (reason, spirit, appetite), similarly to Plato in the Republic (Bk. II, Ch. 3)
- The non-rational aspect itself has two aspects: one that is wholly non-rational (the part responsible for maintenance of the human body), one that is non-rational but can "obey" and be "trained" by reason

Virtue (Bk. II, Chs. 1-4)

Corresponding to the two aspects of the soul are two "kinds" of virtues: virtues of intellect (the aspect that has reason strictly speaking; discussed in Book 6) and virtues of character (the aspect that can obey reason; discussed in Books II-V). We will focus on virtue of character:

- Virtue of character is acquired through habituation (by repeatedly performing just, temperate, etc. acts, one becomes just, temperate, etc.); A compares this to the way in which someone acquires a craft (Ch. 1)
- A notes that the states of character we acquire tend to be "ruined" by excess and deficiency (Ch. 2). For instance, if people stand firm against nothing, they become cowardly, but if they fear nothing and rush into every confrontation, they become rash. If they give in to every pleasure, they become intemperate, but if they refrain from all they become "a kind of insensible person".
- To evaluate the kind of character people have, A claims we can't just look at their actions—we also have to look at the pleasures and pains "in consequence of their actions": "Virtues are concerned with actions and feelings" (1104b14) (Ch. 3)
- The claim that we become virtuous by performing virtuous acts presents a puzzle: if we perform virtuous acts, aren't we already virtuous? (Ch. 4)
- Solution: A distinguishes between [1] performing a virtuous act and [2] performing a virtuous act virtuously—anyone can do the former (even vicious people)
- To perform a virtuous act virtuously, people must also:
 - [A] Act knowingly
 - [B] Decide to perform the action and decide to perform it for its own sake
 - [C] Act from a firm and unchanging state